Parker Jane walked through her classroom, looking over the work that her students had left on their desks for her to check. She strutted through the rows of desks, wishing they were further apart. She was a big girl, and fitting through those narrow rows was one of her least favorite things to do throughout the day.

Regardless, she loved interacting with her pupils and letting them know what she thought of their work. She made it through her checks, then sat back at her desk and began flipping through the lesson plan, realizing that it was time for free talk. She smiled out over her pupils.
