From a convent tower J. G. H Barry

Saint Mary of the Hills lifts the top of its bell-tower up above the pines and looks out over their heads and down into the valley where the river runs crookedly through fields which to-day are just showing the touch of green that cries to us on the hilltop that Spring is coming. A long, low, gray building is our Convent, set against a hill-side where it so blends with the granite out-crop that it seems but a larger boulder among the pines. Back of it the hill slopes up to a plateau where a little pond lies among pines and birches that look down at their own faces in the still dark water that water which to-day is, in the quiet March air, like a plate of polished gun-metal.
