"Puppets On A String" is set in fictional 1957 Hinton, Mississippi. Harold "Web" Webster owns a saw mill and is president of the local school board. One of his employees is Willis Benton. The two men are good friends even though Webster, a white man, and Benton, who is black, never socialize outside of work. Each has his own family, each with its challenges. Life is good, or at least stabile, until some of the local young black men take action to promote civil rights. Their actions eventually draw in members of both the Webster and Benton families. The small town struggles with how to cope with the demands of the civil rights group. Tensions in the community and between the two families mount; towards the end, violence breaks out, creating another level of stress and conflict. None of the characters are saints, just as none are entirely evil. All, instead, try their best to cope with how they've been raised and the situation facing them.
